Given the limited research on the components and mechanisms of work-family conflict, we aimed to investigate whether work-family conflict is a construct of three independent dimensions of inter-role conflict; namely, role conflict (defined by positive and negative expectations concerning both roles), role overload (defined by overload of time demands), and role reversal (defined by time spent on the job for the role of care-provider), and further, whether work-family conflict is affected by work-family positive interaction and supervisor/partner influence. In a sample of 203 employees and their supervisor/partner who have a common-gender and same-occupation relationship in non-profit organizations, mediation analyses revealed that role overload was negatively and work-family conflict was positively predicted by work-family positive interaction. The only single indirect effect that was observed was the significant positive effect of work-family positive interaction on role reversal. The results support the conceptualization of work-family conflict as a construct that comprises three independent dimensions of inter-role conflict, and further, reveal that the amount of conflict associated with work-family positive interaction and supervisor/partner influence. Copyright © 2017 John Wiley & Sons, Ltd.A University of California, San Francisco, student has been arrested after allegedly slashing the tires of several student and faculty cars parked outside a building and then snatching a UCPD bicycle. The incident occurred around 10 a.m. Thursday, June 21. UCPD officers said a 17-year-old girl became upset after being confronted by other students about doing laundry in the building's community washrooms, according to UCPD Chief Michael Meehan.
