Kenya police focus on crackdown on ivory, rhino horn JOHANNESBURG—Kenya's Wildlife Service and police are working to stop poaching and smuggling activities in the country, following the deaths of three rhinos in the past two months and a spate of elephant killings and elephant poaching in the past two years. The discoveries of three dead rhinos last month in Nairobi National Park, near the capital Nairobi, and West Pokot District in the east, have drawn attention to what wildlife officials say are significant increases in the number of poaching attacks in the Kenyan conservation sector. "Poaching has really increased. We're having more poaching this year than last year. It's pretty sad," said Martin Njeuhmeli, head of the Nairobi National Park Wildlife Service. "A lot of poaching is linked with the demand for ivory. We're talking about an eight-fold increase in elephants killed in the last two years compared to the previous eight years," he added. The Nairobi rhino killings have brought the attention of wildlife officials and law enforcement agencies to the poaching activities in the country. Kenya has also seen a sharp rise in elephant poaching in the past two years, with thousands of ivory tusks seized. Poaching activity in recent years has focused on Kenya�

Edit:I fixed some bugs, mouse now uses Brick Jump in case the cat is jumping on the brick, fixed some bad graphics and I added…Brick effect! Play Man or Machine (Mech), inspired by the work of Michael A. Stackpole. The game is a mix of man and machine (yes i know it is confusing) but what can i say, i love this game. You play as a robot, running, jumping and smashing your way through a number of enemy soldiers, tanks, wagons and other obstacles. The difficulty increases as you proceed through the game, but the game is so addictive that you can play it again and again to see what little improvements you can get. - A stable engine able to handle a lot of concurrent players, build, map and be aware of their players' movements - The ability to handle a big number of players, it has to be able to handle at least 100 players - The player is supposed to be notified when they get killed - The ability to handle a number of player movements, respawning the player, but you have the possibility of respawning them a number of times, plus you can change the number of times you respawn the player - The ability to spawn the player outside of the build, without the need of building a structure - Gamepad support and keyboard support So all in all i'm looking for someone who can take my idea, modify the game, remake it as a mod and make it happen, if you can do all this, i'd be happy to support you in this crazy crazy world. isometric view is the best for this game.If you prefer the new overlay map from smite, give us the URL of the overlay map and send it to us. Help our game along the route, build some bluffs so that the game can flow much better. Flak2Face Games is currently in development at Adult Swim Games (formerly known as The Behemoth)

What's new in Visual Novel Maker - Kiwi Glace:

Up! "Sound analysis of Jaws 2. I compare this film's climax with an event that happened during my own high school years, the year before I started college. A bus full of adolescent students had pulled over at our old school, and were smoking marijuana. They started screaming, and I think throwing stuff. It may have been firecrackers. I wasn't there. Anyway, when firemen arrived at the scene, one of them suddenly jumped towards the panic-crazed students, and began waving a gun around. The students thought it was a trap, and began fleeing the area at top speed. It happened in the parking lot of our old high school. A gunman would have needed a quarter million dollars and a police department ready to handle crisis at a moment's notice just to pull such a thing. And it would have been suicidal. So let's hope the director of Jaws 2 has a good imagination, and creates some real crisis that makes his story come alive." Civitas, a San Diego based organization dedicated to civic engagement, needs a columnist for Laptop Media and the Pacific Standard magazine. Reach out to me at dan@civitasrisingup.com. From time to time, I like to contrast the choices we make for local politics versus national and global politics. It gives me hope that the only thing worse than having a two-party system is living in a two-party system. Here's a recent choice we made locally, where the 1st Congressional District incumbent and the one who's defeated him both announced that they would return to the private sector. It was not a happy L.A. business story as both were known for their campaign contributions, but most of all for their expensive hiring of private vendors like PR advisers, PR agencies, law firms and more. Between the candidates, it seemed they spent about $900,000 for paid advertising. That's with a B average. In contrast, I spent a mere $10 on a campaign that counted more votes at the polls than either of them. How is that possible? I made the decision to spend $0 on advertising. I decided to stick with my grassroots community organizing, small town writing and writing reviews, and to ask our local media outlets to take a pass on their political coverage of the bid race. It was so easy to say no to big money advertising. What we saw instead

(posted in the Play This Game forum) This was one of the very first tutorials we put up on Steam, as we know how important it is that players can get an intuitive feel for the game from this demo. The tutorial is very linear - play and win to advance to the next level. This game had one level - the tutorial. This tutorial was designed to introduce all the new concepts - and show you how to win. The gameplay is very important to our users, and the tutorial has always had a focus on doing the job it needs to do - and does it well. The design was very refined during this period, and we've kept it very close to that - to retain the spirit of the original. The design is still evolving, and we have more plans for additional features down the road - but this is a great foundation. A: I'm the author of Irongrave. I programmed that game with my brother and it was the basis of my master thesis. We couldn't really sell it because we didn't have money to spend on marketing. Even later I had to give up my studies to work at an internet company. So Irongrave is the reason why I earned my degree in Computer Science. I tried to release it in as many OS platforms as possible but sadly nothing really worked out. Irongrave is a "niche" game because many of the features simply are too complex for mainstream gamers. Those who spend time on it will feel it is very worthwhile. So what happened? I had to ask myself: "What if I have to fix the source code of Irongrave?" The possibility was too great. It's a nice game, but I figured I'd probably never have the time to fix it. However I had just started working at an internet company. I started there as a junior programmer for 16 months. Not everybody liked my work and I was told that I was wasting company resources and should look for a job somewhere else. At that time I should have quit - but I was 22 and if I had quit, I would have been poorer than now. So I decided to do my best. And indeed it was a difficult period for me. I lost a lot of weight, I didn't eat well. I wanted to quit, but I wasn't allowed. At the beginning of the summer I thought "I'm so tired. I can't even work properly. What am I doing here?" After the
